The price spike here over the Adama Cab is relatively modest, but while I do think this is the best wine, more importantly this is different in style. It clearly has the most finesse and the most tannic pop on the finish as between the two Cabs. Elegant in the mid-palate, it seems like a very classic Old World Cabernet in many respects. It improves the most with aeration, too. It will age the best of Tabor's submissions this issue in all likelihood, and it has the best chance at developing complexity, too. Overall, it is ultimately a pretty decent value and well worth the modest price spike, even if that is not as obvious on first taste." - Reviewed by: The Wine Advocate - 89pts

It came in at 14.5% alcohol, and was unfined and unfiltered. It is showing its oak a bit much, but that should be fine in time. It otherwise seems like a lovely Castel, showing the winery's trademark finesse, yet providing subtle concentration and grip on the finish. At a young age, it is quite accessible, but it clearly needs some time to come together and show more complexity. As it airs out, it shows a crisp and focused finish, admittedly tinged by that oak. The ripe tannins should support it well, while never overwhelming it. This vintage overall seems to be producing some elegant wines, and Castel's performance is right in line with that. This, an understated but rather classy Castel, should come along well. It is still about potential, but I'm leaning up in anticipation. During barrel ageing, I played with creating more complexity in each wine by blending small amounts of each into the other, and as a lark experimented with a total blend of the Cabernet and Merlot with a single barrel of Petite Sirah added. The total blend was markedly superior to any other cepage. It was a result of what ecologists call 'emergent properties', characteristics that emerge in a complex milieu that were previously unobserved in the independent parts of the total. Discovering these emergent properties while blending wine defines one aspect of the art of wine making." - Reviewed by: Producer
